(1) In the first part of the paper, the author discusses the general principles of the theory of the structure of the human mind. He begins by stating that the mind is a complex system of organs, each of which performs a specific function. These organs are arranged in a hierarchical manner, with the highest level being the intellect, which is responsible for the highest forms of thought and reasoning. Below the intellect are the faculties of the soul, which are responsible for the lower forms of thought and feeling. The lowest level of the hierarchy is the body, which is responsible for the physical functions of the mind.

The author then discusses the relationship between the different levels of the hierarchy. He states that the intellect is the source of all knowledge and that it is through the intellect that the soul and the body are able to function. He also states that the soul and the body are both dependent on the intellect for their existence. This view of the mind is based on the idea that the mind is a unified system, in which all the different parts are interconnected and work together to perform the functions of the mind.

In the second part of the paper, the author discusses the specific functions of the different organs of the mind. He begins by discussing the functions of the intellect, which he states are to know, to reason, and to will. He then discusses the functions of the faculties of the soul, which he states are to feel, to desire, and to move. Finally, he discusses the functions of the body, which he states are to receive and to execute the commands of the soul and the intellect.

The author concludes the paper by stating that the mind is a complex system of organs, each of which performs a specific function.
